SONALI BANK

rian government was cooperating with the probe into Leonid Gungorov, Russia's alternate executive director at the World Bank for four months from November 1992 and an adviser to the Russia's executive directors office at the bank through November 1993. Gungorov currently heads a Moscow-based economic institute, BEA and the bank said it was also reviewing what happened to World Bank money channelled through this institute.

"At the request of the government, Mr. Gungorov has been placed on leave by the Board of BEA, pending the results of the investigation," the statement said. "The government and the (World) Bank have agreed that any necessary review of transactions and accounts at the BEA will be carried out."

tion, which lost its banking license last year.

"The bank has launched a full investigation as a matter of urgency, drawing on appropriate expertise, to determine the facts as well as any action that might be warranted," the World Bank's statement said.

"We have hired a law firm—Venable, Baetjer, Howard and Civiletti—to help with a thorough investigation. The investigation is being conducted with the full cooperation of the office of the Russian executive director and the Russian government."

The country is plagued by massive capital flight and regulators in the United States, Britain and elsewhere are investigating claims of massive laundering of cash channelled through Bank of New York.
