

Education sector shows rosy picture

WASIM BIN HABIB

4 YEARS OF AWAMI LEAGUE GOVERNMENT

In the four decades after independence, not that many governments had taken up measures that could be considered remarkable for development of the country's overall education system.

The plans worked out and being implemented by the Awami League-led government may not yield perfect impacts yet. But the education sector in the last four years has seen some major changes taking place, and with good results.

The number of enrolment at all levels has shot up significantly, dropout rate declined considerably, pass rate in the public examinations leapt up, and above all, a massive awareness on education has grown among people.

The government with all seriousness has tried to put an end to the prevailing chaotic education system in its tenure so far.

It dared to take an ambitious step of distributing free textbooks among all students of primary and secondary levels
